

Bahrain Grand Prix

Qualifying at the Bahrain Grand Prix saw Verstappen secure another pole position over Leclerc by 0.226 seconds. From the race start, where Perez overtook Sainz for P4, to the chequered flag, Verstappen led the pack to complete his fifth grand slam. The Red Bull duo secured a one-two finish, while Sainz claimed P3. No safety cars disrupted the race, allowing Verstappen to take the win by 22 seconds and begin his bid for the 2024 title.

Outqualifying teammate Ricciardo by three positions, Tsunoda had the early advantage. However, diverging pit strategies saw Ricciardo on fresher softs in the closing stages, allowing him to overtake Tsunoda on the harder compound tyres. Despite Tsunoda's initial lead, Ricciardo secured P13, one position ahead of his teammate in P14. Post-race, Tsunoda expressed his frustration with team orders that required him to swap positions to Ricciardo in the battle for P12 with Magnussen.

While limited track evolution occurred throughout the Grand Prix, tyre degradation on the Sakhir circuit played a significant role with an EVO rate of -0.051 sec/lap. A majority of the teams opted for two-stop strategy, with hard tyres offering durability but sacrificing pace, while softer compounds delivered quicker lap times but wore out faster. There weren't any significant or abnormal lap times outside pit-stop-induced fluctuations.

Saudi Arabian Grand Prix

Verstappen secured pole position in Jeddah by 0.319 seconds over Leclerc. The race began with a clean start but Perez immediately challenged Leclerc for second place. Ferrari remained the closest competition, with Leclerc ultimately finishing third behind Verstappen and Perez. Despite a safety car on lap 7 due to Stroll's crash, Verstappen emerged victorious by 14 seconds, extending his lead over Perez by 7 points.

Norris started from a strong P6 on the grid, while Bearman lined up in P11 after just missing out on Q3. Norris initially stretched a 16-second lead, but after employing a different pit strategy from many others, and keeping Hamilton at bay, the gap turned in Bearman's favour by around 5 seconds. Norris stayed on mediums during the safety car period and later switched to brand new softs, while Bearman went for hards to run long. This gamble paid off for the debutant, who secured a remarkable P7 on his debut, finishing just 3 seconds in front.

The Jeddah Corniche Circuit saw a EVO rate of -0.070 seconds per lap. Medium tyres were initially favored, but a shift to hards became the favourite after the safety car. Norris had one of the longest medium stints, lasting 37 laps before switching to softs. Hamilton had the same strategy, but a triggered it a lap earlier. The lap time had one big change, with a spike on lap 10 as drivers followed race leader Norris after the safety car period.

Australian Grand Prix

The Australian Grand Prix saw an unexpected change in the grid order. Verstappen secure pole position by 0.730 seconds but was forced to re-tyre his car early on due to a brake failure. Ferrari capitalized on this, with Sainz taking the win and Leclerc holding off Norris for P2. Two safety cars following each Mercedes driver added to the race's unexpectedness. Sainz's eventual victory promoted him to fourth in the drivers' championship, while Leclerc went second, placing himself 4 points behind Verstappen.

Starting P3 and running a shorter medium stint, Leclerc initially led Norris who began P4 and opted for a longer starting stint. Despite Norris' initial tyre advantage and pursuit on the hard compound, Ferrari's strategic call for an earlier pit stop for Leclerc proved successful. With fresher tyres in the closing stages, Norris was catching up to Leclerc but finished in P3, 3.5 seconds behind Leclerc in P2.

Albert Park saw high tyre degradation throughout the race. With an EVO rate of -0.043 seconds per lap, the hard tyres were the preferred compound. Some drivers like Hamilton and Ricciardo started on the softer compounds in a bid to be faster than those on the medium starting stint. However, their stints ended up being the shortest, leading them to an early pit disadvantage. Two safety cars, on laps 17 and 55, caused temporary spikes in lap times.

Japanese Grand Prix

Starting from pole position with just a 0.066-second advantage, Verstappen continued his form throughout the Japanese Grand Prix. While the leaders remained unaffected during the opening lap, Ricciardo and Albon collided, resulting in the end of both their races and a red flag being brought out. For the rest of the race, Red Bull maintained a gap of around 0.250 seconds over Mercedes—the second-fastest team. Verstappen took the chequered flag, widening his lead in the Drivers' Championship from 4 points to 13.

Despite the Ferrari drivers qualifying within 0.104 seconds of each other, Sainz benefited from strategy choice in the Grand Prix. Starting from 4th, he ran a two-stop strategy with mediums and a hard compound tyre, while Leclerc from 8th opted to pit only once. This put Leclerc on older tyres for a longer stint, ultimately resulting in a 3rd place finish for Sainz and a 4th for Leclerc, with the former crossing the line nearly 6 seconds ahead.

The Suzuka Circuit featured low degradation, seen by an EVO rate of -0.074 seconds per lap. The medium compound was the tyre of choice for the top 4 finishers, while the rest opted for the harder compound. Notably, Alonso benefited from starting on softs for an early advantage, and Stroll used a three-stop strategy to maximize their use. Lap times were excluded on lap 2 due to the red flag, and a significant drop occurred after lap 35, likely because the track evolved rapidly.

Chinese Grand Prix

At the Chinese Grand Prix, Verstappen secured another pole position with a gap of 0.322 seconds to P2. Despite starting behind Perez in P3, Alonso was quick to make a move within two turns. Red Bull once again had the fastest car, maintaining a gap of around 0.600 seconds ahead of Ferrari. There was an extended Safety Car period for approximately 9 laps, triggered first by Bottas' retirement, then by Tsunoda's. After 20 more laps of racing, Verstappen clinched his first victory in China, further extending his lead by another 12 points.

Starting the race in P2, Perez trailed Norris who secured P4 in qualifying, a mere 0.183 seconds ahead. Both drivers opted for a one-stop strategy on medium compound tyres. However, Norris extended his first stint by 9 laps compared to Perez, capitalizing on the tyre advantage before pitting during the safety car. This decision paid off, as Norris crossed the finish line in P2, just under 5.5 seconds ahead of Perez.

With an EVO rate of -0.049, the Shanghai Circuit experienced relatively high degradation. The favored tyre choice was the medium compound, with Hamilton starting on the soft compound to advance from P18. Another notable strategy was Alonso's, using all three compounds across three pit stops. Some abnormal lap times were observable due to the slowdown caused by the Safety Car period between laps 22 and 31, as well as increased tyre wear in the closing stages of the race.

Miami Grand Prix

Starting from P2, Norris capitalized on a strategic pitstop during a mid-race Safety Car to secure his first career victory at the 2024 Miami GP. Despite Max Verstappen taking pole by a margin of 0.141 seconds and early race drama with a near-collision between the Red Bull drivers, Ferrari were the fastest team. Two safety car periods further shuffled the field, allowing Norris win by 7.5 seconds and climb to P4 in the Drivers' Championship.

After setting the fastest time in qualifying, Verstappen started in P1 while Norris started in P5. Verstappen was much faster until the safety car period, but after lap 35, Norris took the lead and started to pull away. Both drivers started on medium tyres, but Norris stayed out for 6 laps longer, which gave him a small advantage on the hard tyres. Norris ended up in P1, with Verstappen finishing in P2.

Emilia Romagna Grand Prix

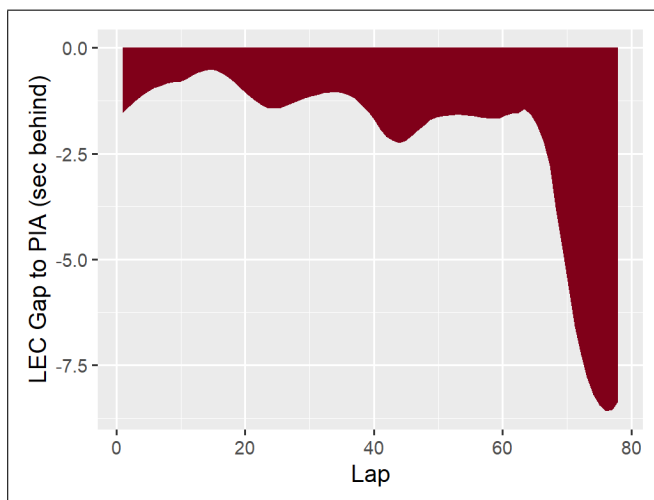

Verstappen secured pole position by a narrow margin of 0.074 seconds over Piastri. The race saw a clean start with the top four maintaining positions, and there was no safety car deployed throughout the race. McLaren emerged as the weekend's fastest team, with Red Bull very marginally behind. Verstappen ultimately took the checkered flag, but only after driveability issues in the closing stages led to a tense battle with Norris. This victory solidified Verstappen's championship lead with Leclerc taking second place from Perez.

Norris and Verstappen were once again starting on the front row of the grid, with the former in P2 and the latter in P1. Verstappen was faster for most of the race, but Norris started closing the gap in the last 20 laps. Both drivers started on medium tires, but Norris changed to hard tires two laps earlier, giving Verstappen a slight advantage on the hard compound. Verstappen finished in P1, with Norris in P2.

Monaco Grand Prix

Leclerc secured pole position a margin of 0.154 seconds over Piastri. A first-lap collision between Perez and Magnussen triggered a red flag, the race's only interruption. McLaren had the fastest pace throughout the Grand Prix, edging out Ferrari by about a tenth of a second per lap. Despite McLaren's advantage, Leclerc led from start to finish, winning his first home Grand Prix by over 7 seconds. This win meant Leclerc chipped away at Verstappen's championship lead, bringing it down from 17 points.

Following an eventful qualifying, Leclerc started P1, sharing the front row with Piastri in P2. Throughout the race, Piastri kept up with Leclerc, maintaining the gap under 2 seconds, but fell behind while passing lapped cars. Both drivers executed the same strategy, starting on the medium compound, then switching to the hard tyre from the red flag to the end of the race. Leclerc finished ahead of Piastri, claiming his first home win.